Sustainable Schools & Communities

Global Source is building learning communities in the Pacific Northwest dedicated to cultivating scholarship, stewardship, citizenship and sustainability. Through the study of food, farming, salmon, forests, mycology, water and other curricula for the bio-region, we can create ecological classrooms and educational communities.

The EduCulture Project provides lived experiences on local farms that teach and learn about farm stewardship and food citizenship. We are enhancing school curricula, nurturing school gardens, and enriching school lunches, while preserving local sustainable agriculture, and growing future generations of farmers. Our locally grown programs include farm-school projects for K-12 education, afterschool programs and summer camps for youth, annual summer institute for educators, internships, and community-based education.

Bearing Witness and Human Rights Education

Teachers know that educating young people in the 21st century involves helping them bear witness to realities past and present, and fostering responsible citizenship in a world of unprecedented interdependence, challenge, and possibility.

What happens when you pair K-12 educators with elders and former detainees of the Japanese American internment to retrace the journey from Bainbridge Island to Manzanar concentration camp? Only What We Can Carry is a ground breaking educational and community development project modeling how lived experiences can inform and shape a more enlightened and authentic curriculum. This experience of bearing witness serves as the seedbed of a process of professional and curricular development aimed at enriching school programs and enhancing school-community relationships.
